At the concert hall, Korean soprano Sumi Jo, who performed for the first time in Russia, looked back at Yuri Simonov, who conducted the concert that day, when the audience continued to call for encores even after the concert was over. After five curtain calls, she had already sung all the songs she prepared. After some thought, Jo managed to finish the concert, calming down audiences by singing a Korean lullaby. The concert lasted a full three hours. Nonetheless, some 1,500 members of the audience would not leave, even after Jo left the stage with her two hands full of bouquets. Throughout the concert, Jo fascinated Russia, the “home of classical music,” with her charisma. Galina Pisarenko, an artist of Russia, claims, “As expected, Sumi Jo’s voice was world-class.”
