The Burghers of Calais is one of the most famous sculptures by Auguste Rodin. It was completed in 1889. It serves as a monument to an occurrence in 1347 during the Hundred Years' War. Calais, an important French port on the English Channel, had held up against attacks from the British army for about one year. However, the starving citizens of Calais could no longer hold out. King Edward III told the people of Calais that they would all be killed unless six of its top leaders (called burghers) presented themselves to him while dressed only in their shirts and with ropes around their necks and the keys to the city in their hands.

When the people of Calais heard the message from King Edward III at the marketplace, they cried in despair. Soon afterward, however, Sir Eustache de St. Pierre, one of the richest citizens of Calais, ① volunteered to die. He got up and said, "Gentlemen, it would be a great shame ② to allow so many people to starve to death if there were any way of preventing it. And it would be highly pleasing to Our Lord if anyone could ③ save them from such a fate. I have such faith and trust in gaining pardon and grace from Our Lord if I die in the attempt, that I will ④ put myself forward as the first. I will ⑤ willingly go out in my shirt, bareheaded and barefoot, with a rope round my neck and put myself at the mercy of the king of England."
