When the people of Calais heard the message from King Edward III at the marketplace, they cried in despair. Soon afterward, however, Sir Eustache de St. Pierre, one of the richest citizens of Calais, volunteered to die. He got up and said, "Gentlemen, it ① would have been a great shame to allow so many people to starve ② to death if there were any way of preventing it. And it would be highly pleasing to Our Lord if anyone ③ could save them from such a fate. I have such faith and trust in gaining pardon and grace from Our Lord if I ④ die in the attempt, ⑤ that I will put myself forward as the first. I will willingly go out in my shirt, bareheaded and barefoot, with a rope round my neck and put myself at the mercy of the king of England."
