Archaeologists not only look for lost objects, but they _____ look for answers to all of the questions about the things they find.

Archaeologists studied a stone Pueblo god and made a copy, with the lost arm replaced, to show how the god looked long ago. They also painted the copy with the stripes of the original. Finding objects is just one part of the archaeologist's work. Studying the objects, comparing them, and restoring them to their original state are also parts of the archaeologist's work. In hundreds of ways, archaeologists dig up things of the past to learn more and more about people of ancient times. Their work is important because we can not only learn how to improve modern living but _____ avoid some of the problems of earlier times. We can determine our own levels of progress, or even "regress," and work forwards towards improvement and betterment. It is also our good fortune that archaeologists discover great and beautiful works of art.
